FOREWORD

In 2019 no one could foresee that a year later entire countries would be shut down to curb the spread of a highly contagious virus. When the gravity of the COVID-19 pandemic became clear in March 2020, Canada, like many other nations, imposed strict “lockdown” measures on almost all sectors of society. Overnight, most Canadians became confined to their homes. Office buildings, malls, streets, public spaces and airports emptied. Only essential services, such as grocery stores, pharmacies, and gas stations, were allowed to operate under strict “physical distancing” conditions.

As our understanding of SARS-CoV-2 (the virus that causes COVID-19) grew and lockdown measures persisted for several weeks and months, glaring inefficiencies in community design started to become unignorable. Our response to challenges that had previously been inadequately addressed - multimodal transportation, a high-quality public realm, age-friendly and accessible planning, for example - have now become essential precursors for the creation of a resilient post-pandemic world. Conversations on the future of cities have become commonplace in mainstream society, and some of the best and brightest minds in the planning profession have made valuable contributions to this discourse. Now is exactly the right time to listen to what they have to say.

Urban planners are conventionally involved in shaping the built form and the policies that inform physical environments. The events of 2020 have highlighted the importance of interdisciplinary cooperation in addressing the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. The adaptability of the physical, political, and social environment of a community determines its resilience, and how impactful the effects of the pandemic will be on that community. Thus, planners and professionals working in government, business, economic development, transportation, and other industries have a unique role in making space for and fostering that adaptability in public and private space, in urban and rural or remote settings alike.

Ensuring that professionals have access to resources that will aid in their usefulness during the COVID-19 pandemic is crucial. A central database that includes information on changing legislation, urban design principles that can facilitate social distancing, and the provision of housing in a quick and cost-effective way, may make industry professionals' working lives easier to navigate in this currently chaotic time. This document was developed to empower urbanists from all walks of life with emerging knowledge and considerations to assist them in preparing their communities and organizations for post-pandemic recovery and adaptation.

This resource guide was developed by three recent graduates of the Queen's University School of Urban and Regional Planning: Adrian van Wyk, Elysia Ackroyd and Leena Lamontagne-Dupuis, with assistance from Rachel MacKnight and Alicia Kunkel, and with the support of the Canadian Institute of Planners. This document contains over 800 curated resources collected from March to October 2020, and includes academic articles, best-practices documents, news reports, podcasts, panel discussions and more relating to the impacts of COVID-19 on the discipline of city-building.

HOW TO USE THIS GUIDE

This resource guide has been developed to assist urbanists in understanding the impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic on Canadian communities and preparing them for post-pandemic recovery and adaptation. It includes over 800 resources that have been collected and curated since stay-at-home orders were imposed in March 2020. The document is divided into 20 topic-specific sections that are relevant to the discipline of urban and regional planning. Under each category, resources are presented in alphabetical order according to the following format:

TITLE
AUTHOR/S
Date	Publisher	Resource type	Location
keywords

The title of each resource is hyperlinked. For convenience, readers can click on the title of each resource and it will open in a separate window. Keywords are presented after publication information to give readers a sense of what the content of the resource entails.

Since the start of this project in March 2020, a plethora of resources and information has become available relating to the intersection of urban planning and the COVID-19 pandemic. The first section of the guide, Additional Resources, includes databases and webpages containing further resources that may not have been included in this document. Readers are encouraged to use this guide as a starting point for their own research. This guide may be updated from time to time to include new resources that have been made available since the time of its publication.
